Ecofeminism in Atwood’s Surfacing

Priyanka Gupta*

Abstract –

The most important problem that an individual faces today is the demotion of land and environment and its consequences on human presence. In this conditions the term Ecofeminism becomes highly relevant. This paper attempts to take an in-depth study of Margaret Atwood’s Surfacing (1972) from an ecofeminist mindset. Within this text, power and domination, directly afflict both the womanly world and the natural world. The nameless idol of the story is an ecofeminist who returns to the undeveloped island, Northern Quebec, where she grew up, to search for her missing father. The protagonist realizes the gap between her natural inside her and her artificial construction only when she encounters true nature at most. The ecofeminist impact is seen implicit in the novel by the protagonist’s return to the natural world. Her association with nature raises her awareness of deception of women. Like a true ecologist, she makes the earth her literal home which she knows that in the natural world all life is inter-related, brimming with diversity and complexity. Since the novel introduces issue pertaining to feminism and environmentalism, the novel constitutes a representative literary example of ecological feminism. Even the language, events and characters in this novel reflect a world that oppresses and dominates both femininity and nature.

Introduction

“I am not an animal or a tree, I am the thing in which the trees and animals move and grow, and I am a place.”

- (Surfacing, 236)

“Eco-feminism suggests that an end to the oppression of women is bound up with ecological values and those women should be centrally concerned with ending the exploitation of the ecosystem (Collard, 1988). Eco-feminism has been particularly strong within radical feminism and within the Green Movement”.

Eco-feminism is a new way of approaching nature. According to Andy Smith – eco-feminists are mostly concerned about the oppression of women and the brutality of earth. They believe that the domination of women over the years is directly connected to the environmental rape of our planet. Thus, issues of power, domination and subordination are very vital to eco-feminism. As the term suggests, it is a combination of ecology and feminism (Womanly). According to Greta Gaard, Eco-feminism‘s basic premise is that the ideology, which authorizes oppressions such as those based on race, class, gender, sexuality and physical abilities, is the same ideology which sanctions the oppression of nature. Eco-feminist theorists consider the interconnections between sexism, the domination of nature, racism, specialism and other social inequalities.

Object of The Study

This paper attempts to take an in-depth study of Margaret Atwood‘s Surfacing (1972) from an eco-feminist perspective. The Canadian writer has dealt with the issue of women and nature in many of her novels. The writing and publication of Surfacing coincides with the emergence of the feminist and ecological movements and obviously reflects the concerns of its time. Oppression of women in a male dominated society and exploitation of nature in a society having new developments in technology, are the major themes of her writings. Within this text, power and domination, directly oppress both the feminine world and the natural world.

The nameless protagonist of the story is an eco-feminist who returns to the undeveloped island, Northern Quebec, where she grew up, to search for her missing father. The protagonist is a commercial artist and seems to have come back to her birthplace after many years. She is accompanied by her three friends - Anna, Joe and David. The story follows the protagonist’s search for her father, which serves as a pretext for her search for her inner-self which is observed through her gradual submersion into nature and towards mystical vision. Her relationship with her lover and friend are played out alongside this search. Her relationship with her teacher, her attempt to abortion, which she now sees as murderous, shows her emotional and artistic death. She becomes a symbol for all those who are exploited and abused because of their powerlessness. At the end of the novel she realizes nature provides no identity, and she declares herself ready for motherhood and for reintegration into society. In this process, she unmask the dualities and inconsistencies in both her personal life and her patriarchal society. Through the struggle to reclaim her identity and roots, the protagonist begins a psychological journey that leads her directly into the natural world.

Justification

The protagonist realizes the gap between her natural self and her artificial construct only when she encounters nature. While searching for her missing father in the wilderness and under the lake, she recognizes the extent to which nature has been victimized by the Americans. Her evolving awareness of herself as a victim is parallel to this recognition. Men destroy nature and women just for their fun. The relationship between nature and men is relationship of exploitation. As the renowned eco-feminist Petra Kelly observes, Women are sex toys for men, women’s lives count less than those of men; women who assert their independence and power are in some way defective (118). She realizes that as she has been violated, the sacredness of the Mother Earth is violated and the ecological unity, which means the independence of all species, is disturbed. Atwood shows man’s misuse and woman’s use of nature in Surfacing. The first sentence of the novel indicates the death of white birches:

“I can’t believes me’m on the same road again, twisting along past the lake where the white birches are dying, the disease is spreading up from the South, and I notice they now have sea-planes for hire”. (Surfacing, 3)

The nameless protagonist finds a reflection of her own tragedy in the Quebec landscape. She expresses a deep concern for nature and helps the readers understand the women-nature connection. In the course of her homeward journey she discovers that nothing is the same. I don’t know the way anymore. (Surfacing, 10) She has been alienated from the landscape of her country, for the Old road ‘has been closed for years and what she needs is the new one‘but she does not know the way anymore‘. Throughout the novel Atwood reminds the readers that ecological destruction pervades the setting whether it is to control the dam or the destruction of older trees. The trees will never be allowed to grow tall again, they’re killed as soon as they’re valuable, big trees are scarce as whale.

Fishing in the lake is a metaphor which suggests entrapment. Soon, the female protagonist realizes that in her capacity for evil, she herself has not been different from them. The illusion of her childhood innocence shatters and she recalls a childhood game, the stabbing of the doll, which actually foreshadowed her abortion. The novel reminds the readers of the differences between natural predation and the hunting done by the man which is done for the excitement of killing. This contributes to the alienation of modern man from the natural world. As Vandana Shiva points out, it is not hunting which leads to a violent relationship with nature: —it is the elevation of hunting to the level of ideology which does sol (Staying Alive, 50). The narrator draws attention to at least two such acts of meaningless killing: the shooting of the heron and the explosions made at the lake by Americans who come for fishing. Increasingly, the narrator feels herself hurt by whatever harms she sees done to the environment, including animals. She is disgusted by Joe and David‘s filming of the fish‘s innards. She does not want to kill the fish herself, the second time. I couldn‘t anymore, I had no right to, we don‘t need it, our proper food was tin cans. We were committing this act, this act. Violation, for pleasure, recreation they call it.‖ (Surfacing, 153). The word recreation has been ironically used here. Then she releases the frogs into the lake and this, in turn, triggers off memories relating to the release of the frogs bottled by her brother. His subsequent anger constitutes her first lesson in patriarchal pressure. The aborted child is also recalled as a bottled frog. Her childhood drawings consist of rabbits with their colored egg-houses— and all that is normal and green. This is in contrast to her brother‘s drawings of war and death and as a grown up his profession is one that involves violating the earth.

Scope of The Study

Atwood emphasizes the fact that men exploit the bodies of women for their needs. They even control the process of childbirth which nature has assigned only to women. The protagonist also questions the excessive use of reproductive technologies. The modern techniques, in the guise of assisting woman, rob her of the ability to sense her bodily rhythms. Hence, she does not want the child to be taken out with a fork, —like a pickle out of a pickle jarl (101). The effect of the fertility controlling pills upon the protagonist's eye, that is, of blurring her vision, also becomes significant in this context.

The novelist has made an attempt to create an emphatic relationship between the wounded self of the unnamed protagonist and the damaged landscape of the island near the border country in Quebec. Her journey to Quebec with her three friends made her see into the life of things and in the process she gets away from all- her friends as well as the American-Canadians who indulge in senseless cruelty to birds, trees and fish. Atwood writes:

At the midway pond the heron was still there, hanging in the hot sunlight like something in a butcher's window, desecrated, unredeemed. It smelled worse the death of the heron was causeless, undiluted.

She realizes though belatedly that no human being can help her in discovering her real self and, therefore, she turns to nature. Ironically enough it is only when she identifies herself with the damaged landscape that she discovers herself. She becomes part of the landscape but prior to this, she discards her marriage ring, her name and her seeming identity. In her healing process, the narrator begins to compare herself with the dead heron. The brutal and unnecessary murder of the heron presents a direct ecological parallel to the experience of the narrator. According to Rigney, The protagonist sees the heron as symbolic of her own psychological deathl (100). She feels the deep disgust towards the killing of the bird and compares it with oppression and harassment of women. Women's association with fertility and men's with environment abuse serves as a metaphor of the violation of women by men:

"Why had they strung it up like a lynch victim, why didn't they just throw it away like the trash? To prove they could do it, they had the power to kill, otherwise, it was valueless, the only relation they could have to a thing like that was to destroy.”

When she links her own life with those of the other beings of nature, she is able to perceive the rhythm of nature, its cycle of life and death. She comes to feel that in order to be one with nature; she has to shed her clothes to become like the victim animals. She survives on mushrooms, plants and berries. She merges with the forest, descending even further to the level of plants. After linking her life with the natural things, she feels that her life has been totally changed. She feels:

“Through the trees the sun glances; the swamp around me smoulders, energy of decay turning to growth, green fire. I remember the heron; by now it will be insects, frogs, fish and other herons. My body also changes, the creature in me, plant-animal, sends out filaments in me, I ferry it secure between death and life, I multiply”

Like a true ecologist, she makes the earth her literal home for she knows that in the natural world all life is interrelated, teeming with diversity and complexity. She is not afraid of any one. There is no one to boss over her and violate her physique. She becomes one with her sacred Mother Earth. She throws away all her civilization as it is destroying the biosphere. She may recreate a culture that respects to seek harmony with nature. Those whom she has known are living in the city now, in a different time. She remembers her man, the fake husband for whom she now feels nothing but sorrow. She totally relies on Mother Earth. Gods are questionable to her; it includes even Jesus Christ who is to her theoreticall. She is not prepared to rely on anyone, it includes even Joe. She gains absolute freedom now. Firmly rooted to the Earth like the original people several years ago, she, with an enormous contentment says,

“The lake is quiet, the trees surround me, asking and giving nothing”
Conclusion

Since the novel introduces issue pertaining to feminism and environmentalism, the novel constitutes a representative literary example of ecological feminism. Even the language, events and characters in this novel reflect a world that oppresses and dominates both femininity and nature. This actual journey is the surface meaning while the deep meaning lies in the journey of self-discovery and assertion of her individual identity. These two kinds of meanings links ecology with feminism and make the novel an eco-feminist novel. However, she does not want to overturn patriarchy and replace it with women’s dominance. She wants to transform nonviolently the structures of male dominance and restore a kind of balance and harmony between women and men.
